As we see today, we see we have a scientific community that was taken over by neoliberalism and neopositivism, where they rarely accept new knowledge and do not accept anything new within it, that is why the need arises for the socialization of the means of science and technology with the purpose of ending this problem.

To socialize the means of science and technology, we first need to create scientific and technological cooperatives that enable their socialization, in order to have the means of science and technology socialized, and that allows the entry of new people in a simpler way, too, facilitating the entry of people to universities and increasing university vacancies according to what they need.

With the socialization of the means of science and technology, we may have several scientific communities and technologies that study on various topics, such as the Internet (well, a little), but in a more dynamic way, where we could even have extra-scientific communities. and para-scientific within these communities, thus increasing their interaction and ending the so-called "pseudo-scientificism" that neo-positivists and neo-gods so much claim while defending a scientism (neo-scientific) based on neopositivism and neo-neo -ism.

The study of extraciences, paraciences and neurosciences within this new socialized community, must be done in order to follow its own methodologies, but there is always some method behind it, mainly dealing with the previous three.

We can consider this socialization of the means of science and technology a perfect scenario of what a social-technocracy would be like, where everyone can do science, extracience, paracience or neoscience in a simple, fast way, without bureaucracy and without the scientific elitism that exists today today, in addition to the fact that science and technology are no longer totally linked to capitalism and neoliberalism.
